

FAA Honors Executive Jet Management With Diamond Award for 6th Straight Year

Executive Jet Management has been presented with the Federal Aviation Administration's Diamond Award for training excellence for the sixth consecutive year.

EJM received the employer Diamond Award for having 25 percent or more of its maintenance technicians qualify for an individual training award in 1999 and for the company's Grey Owl Human Factors Safety Training Program.

The Grey Owl program enables EJM employees and supervisors to recognize co-workers attitudes and working relationships and how they affect job performance. All EJM line mechanics have been through Grey Owl training at least once and 65 percent have participated in the training program three times, according to Richard Williams, EJM's director of maintenance.

"What the FAA Diamond Award means is that EJM is putting through a great deal of effort and financial support to make sure that its people are trained properly," says Williams. "EJM has already qualified for the year 2000 FAA Diamond Award, which will be our seventh year in a row. EJM has had 100 percent of its maintenance employees participate in training for six straight years," he adds.
